

SCARY SHIT'S

The Unnamable part 3

The movie ends when Alyda and Carter make their way to the Miskatonic University library to find the missing pages from the book Carter had found in the previous film. Carter and Alyda find the pages and Carter begins to recite the text which will banish the demon from reality...however the spell will actually merge Alyda with the demon once again. During the merging, Carter substitutes a chair in place of Alyda. The demon then becomes one with a wooden chair. Alyda however needed the demon to sustain life, without, she grows old and dies in Carters arms.

The sequel also shares elements with it's written counterpart, "The Statement of Randolph Carter". However in the film, Howard stays on the surface while Randolph enters the crypt with his professor. The use of walkie talkies in the film mirrors the use of the telegraph device with the long cord used in the short story. The very end of the story is very creepy and chilling...the very last line of dialogue is haunting! I recommend reading the story this (or any) Halloween!

The creature in the sequel wasn't as cool looking as the original, but every now and then in the movie it was kinda scary. Some of the scenes were just bad though. There is a scene where a female police officer encounters the demon. Her dialogue is "oh great...it's a bitch", followed by a horrendous "flying" scene.

In the original story "The Unnamable", characters Joel Manton and Randolph Carter are sitting discussing a local legend...which turns out to be more than legend. The film depicts this, but adds the character Howard Damon. In the story both Manton and Carter live, however in the film Manton dies. Howard assumes the role of Manton in the sequel, having come face to face with "The Unnamable".

Growing up I have always had a strange fear of the creature from the movie. I guess it was just the make up effects or whatever. I'm not scared of it anymore, but every now and then i'll turn on lights before, I enter a dark room!

